The Turn of the Tide

OUR editorial "September 1st" drew some interesting comments this week. The panic which followed publication of the government's cotton estimate in August has spent itself, and people are settling down to consider their actual resources this autumn.

For the most part, the facts justify what we wrote in our editorial Tuesday—Hempstead county is immeasurably better off than a year ago, and by contrast with the rest of the country is probably as well off as in the fall of 1929. What we mean is, our section suffered a severe decline during the drought year and then came back, visibly and dramatically, while the rest of the nation started slipping in 1929 and has hardly stopped to this very day.

One Hempstead county landowner told us Wednesday that in 1930 he raised but 47 bales of cotton. He reduced his acreage by one-third, and yet his crop this year will be 100 to 125 bales.

His cotton at 10 cents was worth $2,350 last year. But for 1931, at 6 cents, he will collect from $3,000 to $3,750.

These figures show that he is beating 1930, of course—not hard to do, considering that it was a year of almost total crop failure. But his cost figures show much more than that. His costs are so low that they put his 1931 showing close to a normal year, notwithstanding 6-cent cotton.

This landowner spent $2,000 for fertilizer in 1930, probably his average annual outlay. But this year his fertilizer bill was only $235. On a $3,000 to $4,000 cash crop, he is down to 1/16th on this one item of expense.

Other costs are down, though less drastically. His tenants grew all their feedstuffs this year. They owe less than half what they incurred for personal expense last year.

As it begins to appear to us now, a half dollar's worth of cotton will go as far this year as a whole dollar's worth went in 1930 and 1929—then this is the material for a new and greater confidence in our county and state, at a time when the East is dreading the approach of its third panic winter.

We have been trying to point out that the agricultural states are most apt to lead the way back to prosperity. We are now in the position of the last decade, when the nation concentrated on industrial promotions. But agriculture holds a high place in America's estimation today, when industrial plants are closed down and their workers are walking the streets, neither able to get employment nor yet able to return readily to the farm from whence they came.

This Man MacDonald

IN the political upheaval in Great Britain that has brought about an epochal change in the Empire's government, a most important fact, in the opinion of many unbiased American observers, is that Premier Ramsay MacDonald seems a bigger man in defeat than he would have been in victory.

Faced with a financial crisis that gravely menaced his nation, MacDonald responded to the call of the welfare of his people first and to the political fortunes of his party second.

Though leader of the Labor party, which represents the "left wing" in British political thought, he recognized the grave necessities of the situation and chose to play ball with Conservative members, Great Britain now has a "government of national unity" with MacDonald at its head. The best man in each of the three widely divergent political groups are now working hand in hand to rescue their nation from threatened economic disaster.

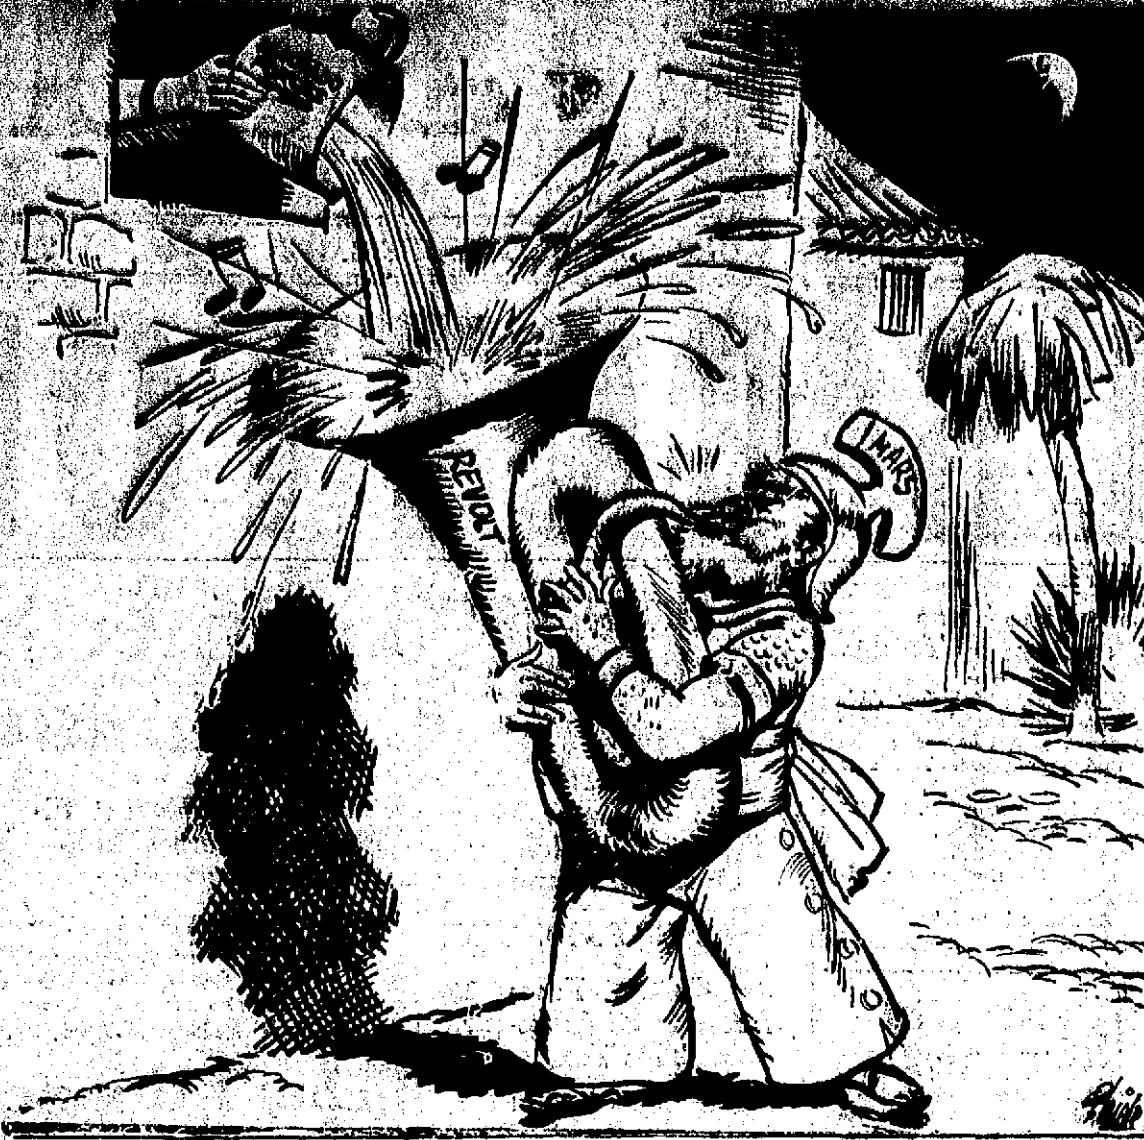

Looming above them all is MacDonald himself, who might have chosen to play the part of a blind and selfish politician, forced a victory for his party at the expense of the public welfare. Failing in victory, he might have stubbornly fallen in a crashing defeat with widespread damage to the interests of his beleaguered nation. Either development would have meant no good to the other nations of the world with whom Britain's fortunes are interlocked by trade and commerce.

Of course, there are some who will say that MacDonald "surrendered to the enemy." Chauvinistically, they will insist that a party leader should stand by his party to the last ditch. Blindly, they will see only the narrow political path that a politician is supposed to tread, overlooking the wider roads that lead toward the common good of the people.

The world needs more great political leaders like Ramsay MacDonald. It needs men with a vision broader than mere party politics. It needs men who are firm enough to act on the best dictates of their judgment, who are brave enough to conciliate with the opposition parties when conciliation means advancement of the public welfare.

The development may not have solved Britain's problem of depression—perhaps the basic conditions creating the crisis will remain—but MacDonald seems to be doing his best.

BEGIN HERE TODAY

PROXY NORMA KENT, 25-year-old secretary in a law office, was a "What's the matter?" Mark repeated. "Don't you want to go to Blue Springs?"

"Of course—only, Mark, do you think we should? I mean do you think right now?"

"Right now? Say, when is it customary to go on a honeymoon? After the ceremony, or 15 years later? If there's some place you'd rather go than Blue Springs, I suppose I can change the tickets. I was sure you'd like it there!"

"No, no! It isn't that. I'd love it, of course. I'd love any place with you."

SHE could not endure to see the light of enthusiasm fade from his face. Norma went on, laughing. "Did you say we start in two hours? Oh, I'm glad I packed things before you came. We'll have to hurry, won't we?"

Travers was not satisfied. He put a hand on her arm, studied her face, searchingly.

"Tell me why you don't want to go to Blue Springs," he said.

"I do want to go, Mark! I guess—well, all the time I was here alone I was thinking we'd have to find some place to live that doesn't cost too much. You—you aren't going back to your father's office, are you? I thought we'd have to save our money until you'd found another job."

"So that's it!" Mark's laugh was a shout. "But we're not poor, darling. We've got money—lots of it! Here! Take a look at this wallet again. There's $1446 in that wallet of filthy lucre. Enough for a fair sort of honeymoon, don't you think? That's the kind of a man your new husband is, Madam. Walks out without a single penny in his pockets and comes back with $1446!"

He had not answered the question about returning to his father's office but Norma did not notice this. Her eyes were dazzled by that tremendous roll of bank bills.

"Oh, Mark, it's such a lot! You wouldn't spend all that just on a trip?"

"Would it? Lady, Mark Travers' wives always get the best. Look—do you want to know how I got it?" She nodded, round-eyed.

Mark grinned again. "Sold the car! Might have got more out of it but this had to be cash. That's why I was gone longer than I expected to be."

"You sold your roadster?"

Mark nodded. "Quickest way I could think of to get car-fare and a little extra. We could have driven to Blue Springs but how'd we pay this hotel bill? Eureka—enter Mark Travers, the financier! Now tell me, don't you think you've married a bright boy?"

"Of course I do! Oh, of course I do!"

They began to make hasty preparations for the trip. Ten minutes of the two hours which Mark had allowed them were gone. The little brown over-night bag which Norma had brought with her the evening before—all the luggage they possessed—stood waiting. Mark held the polo coat and the girl hung her arms into it.

"Look here!" he announced suddenly, "there's a shop where my sister used to buy things. You can get clothes at Blue Springs but you ought to take something more along." (He knew she had only the one brown dress.) "We'll check out, climb into a taxi and dash around to that place—Fanchon's, I believe it's called. You can buy a dress in half an hour, can't you?"

"I can if you'll help me!"

It was all delightful, impossible and exciting. They went down into the handsome hotel lobby. Norma was self-conscious, imagined the eyes of everyone about were on her. And why not when such a handsome, distinguished youth as Mark Travers was by her side? Her cheeks flushed.

THEY stepped into a taxicab and were whisked away into traffic. Here on either side of the street were familiar buildings and yet everything looked different. Mark's hand pressed the girl's. He stole a quick kiss and made her blush more deeply.

"Happy, kid?"

She assured him to his complete satisfaction that she was. Another 10 minutes and they had arrived before the impressive white stone front of "Fanchon's." Twin show windows exhibited each a single frock. Even the name, "Fanchon," on the inconspicuous metal tablet hinted at exclusiveness and expense.

Norma hesitated, wondering if she had the courage to enter such a place. Travers had turned to the cab driver. "Wait for us," he instructed.

They went into the shop and a sweet, black-satin clad woman came forward to meet them. Somehow Norma made it know that she wanted to buy a traveling dress or perhaps a suit. She was in a fever of self-consciousness, aware of the shabbiness of her costume in comparison with those about her. She thought of the taxicab outside, its meter clicking away dimes and quarters. What a way to shop!

Mark's face, smiling, loomed before her and she was reassured.

They bought the traveling suit—a gray tweed with threads of blue in it and snug, trimly fitted collar and cuffs of light-colored krummer. They selected gray because Mark reminded Norma she had worn gray the first time he saw her. There was a bluish tint that came down closely over the head but hid none of the glory of the soft-waving hair about her face. It was a beautiful costume and fitted without alteration. Fanchon brought out even shoes and purse and gloves to go with the tweed suit.

The minutes were flying. Norma, getting into her new dress hurriedly, reappeared from the dressing room.

"I'm ready now, Mark!"

He had caught sight of another frock which she must have—an evening dress of lovely peach-colored soft stuff with shoulders dropped like an 1880 belle's.

"Oh, but we don't have time!" the girl protested.

"Is it the right size?" Mark asked the saleswoman.

"It should be. The young lady is so slender. She wears the gowns exactly as they have been created."

When they finally emerged from Fanchon's barely 15 minutes remained before departure of the train for Blue Springs. Boxes of assorted sizes jostled about them in the taxicab. Mark's roll of bank bills was $425 thinner.

THE taxi driver complied with Travers' instruction to "step on it." The cab careened through the crowded streets, turned corners on two wheels, jolted to abrupt, breath-taking stops for traffic signals and discharged them at last at the cab entrance of the huge railway station.

"Fifty seconds to make it!" Mark whistled sharply. "Red cap!" he shouted. "Red cap!"

Two colored boys rushed up and loaded themselves with the packages. Mark thrust a bill at the cab driver whose eyes widened as he realized its denomination. Then with the boys in red caps leading Norma and Mark ran pell-mell for the train gates.

A brakeman was shouting "All aboard! All aboard!" for the last time as they swung onto the car. Breathless, they floundered to seats in their compartment. The colored boys dropped the luggage and made a swift retreat. The train had begun to move, was gradually gathering speed.

Norma looked at Mark.

"We—we got here!" was all she could manage to gasp. She raised one hand to straighten the little black hat that had been pushed back at a foolish angle in the run for the train.

There came a tap at the door. Mark answered. It was the conductor. Something about the tickets needed to be settled. Only a moment and the couple were alone again.

Norma had discarded the troublesome little hat. Mark helped her out of her coat. Somehow this led to slipping his arms about her, whispering his precious nonsense. Norma's hair became badly disarranged but neither of them noticed that.

"Happy, kid?"

It was to become a habit of Mark's during the next few weeks to make that inquiry. As habitually and with emphasis the girl was to answer as she did then:

"Of course!"

Without talking they watched the landscape stream past. Mark's arms were about his bride. Her head rested on his shoulder. They had passed the suburbs now and were flying through wooded ravines. The foliage, touched by the first frost of October, had begun to show gorgeous tones of gold and scarlet.

"What time is it, Mark?"

"Nearly six. I'll have the porter bring a menu. You'd rather eat here than go into the dining car, wouldn't you?"

She nodded. Instead of summoning the porter, however, both preferred to prolong that perfect interval. The shadows on the countryside grew longer.

Why at that moment of all times should memories she had reluctantly put behind suddenly reappear to plague Norma? She turned away from Mark. What was he saying? She heard the words dimly:

"Oh, there's something I forgot—something important!"

When the right one comes along...

You wonder why you
wasted time on the others!
This been-waiting-all-my-life feeling has hit millions of smokers, men and women both... when they broke open their first Chesterfield package and caught its more pleasing aroma... when they lighted their first Chesterfield and knew, that minute, that it was milder—
not sharp or biting.
And after a few puffs, they knew that the taste was better. Here were the cigarettes they had always hoped for,
and looked for.

Here were the cigarettes that satisfy! Satisfy—that's the word that "fits."
The right tobaccos—the CHESTER-FIELD kind of tobaccos, Domestic and Turkish—cured and aged, blended and cross-blended in the right way. Everything that goes into Chesterfield is the best that money can buy and that science knows about. The paper is just right.
Everything about them is just right.
Notice the difference.
They Satisfy... and—they're milder.
Smoke as many as you like!
